Organic semiconductors promise versatile and complementary electronic and optoelectronic devices, since they can be formulated as thin-films by printing and coating. To date, the reported large-area fabrication of such flexible devices has been restricted to thick crystalline or amorphous films, which are rigid and brittle, respectively. We demonstrate that organic semiconductors can be printed onto a wide variety of flexible substrates, such as plastic foils and paper, from solution, without the aid of a printing agent. Both semiconducting and conducting solution-processed compounds are used and direct-viewed by the naked eye. By combining the printability, electrical and optoelectronic devices are made on a single substrate, which shows high device yield. The approach is therefore a feasible technique for large-area and flexible solution-processed electronics.The package for this software used the name HADOOP for the installer and version 1.0.0 for the source. It has recently been renamed to HDP and the source code has been moved under that project. Hadoop is a framework written in Java to implement large scale distributed processing for storing, aggregating, and analyzing large amounts of data. It includes

Asthma is a chronic respiratory illness that affects all age groups worldwide. Symptom control is a primary goal of asthma management. Intranasal (IN) steroids are used for symptom relief in mild asthma and as controller therapy for severe disease. However, evidence regarding the efficacy of intranasal therapy in asthma is controversial. To review the evidence from randomized, controlled trials of the effect of IN steroids on asthma outcomes and the influence of asthma control level on the effect. An electronic literature search was performed to identify all randomized, controlled trials that investigated IN steroids in the treatment of mild or moderate asthma from the beginning of 1990 to March 2010. Additionally, bibliographic reviews were done to identify additional trials. Trials were selected on the basis of current relevance and methodology and grouped according
